

Neo Liberal Policies and Economic Crises

Abstract:

The economic crisis, in its simplest form, is that the economic life becomes ineffective when the majority of the society is economically ineffective due to the inability to create demand or supply. The most important reflection of the economic crises is the effect on the redistribution of wealth in the country. The economic bottlenecks experienced to date reveal an important feature of the capitalist economic understanding based on Neo liberal policies, which is the main target of capital accumulation. As the wages of large society groups working with labor as a result of profit maximization have been reduced, a large part of the society has lost its existing economic assets and purchasing power, while a narrow segment has been strengthened as a result of these crises. In this study, the economic crises that take place both on a national and global scale, whether the capitalist system is really an incidental situation for itself and its owners, will be examined through its theoretical background and historical experience.
